Verbal Description

A mano made of small-pored vesicular basalt. ~~Its~~ Cross-section is a flattened oval. Given that complete manos are generally larger, and that one end of this is larger than the other, I think this piece was once larger, then broke, was reshaped on the broken end, and then further used as a mano. The original finished end is 5.4 x 4.2 cm. While it has a large chip taken out of it, one can still see the ground surface from the original finishing. The other end is pecked, with the edges rounded off, but none of it has more than a very light grinding. The working facet is very flat and smooth, with a slight sheen. The remainder of the circumference is also ground and smooth, but less so than the working facet.
